Mahatma Gandhi once said: "Be the change that you wish to see in the world". But what does this quote imply? I believe that what it says is to act however you'd want the people around yourself to act. Allow me to elaborate.

First of all, influencing other people's lifestyles is a hard task, an arduous one, even. However, influencing yourself is much easier as it is yourself. By changing yourself for the better not only does your life become healthier, more successful, etc., you also become a role model for the others. It's one thing to tell others to how to act, but actually showing them the behaviour you deem acceptable is a whole other.

We see it all around ourselves at all stages of our life. A child gets its habits and behaviour patterns by looking at their parents. After all, everyone knows that the best way to teach a child is to constantly show what's right and what's wrong. Another great example would be volunteers. Of course, they do tell and announce the rights and wrongs of human life, but along these announcements they act. Some help the homeless, others shelter stray animals and there are those developing new, more 'green', ways of life, but all of them act on their own.

In conclusion, I'd say that Gandhi was right, and that the only way to change the world is to start with oneself.
